The European Commission's decision is a landmark. The amount of the subsidy is limited to the production of certain pig-breeds, leaving to the entrepreneur the right to sell the piglets. The piglets are not independent of the entrepreneur as the latter can sell them elsewhere. We have reported that the independence of contractors is one of the criteria used by the Commission. What is important is that the Commission has not found it to be the case in this case. The Commission has also ruled that the existence of a large number of the subsidised area is especially important in order to establish that the aid is not a subsidy. The Commission has also ruled on the stability and consistency of the intervention provided by the European Commission.
